A school-boy had his hair severely pulled in a quarrel; after which a small tumor arose on his head, which he concealed for three weeks,. By this time, it had increased from the size of a pea, till it extended seven inches long and four broad, over the parietal and frontal bone. It was likewise very high, but attended with no inflammation. To prevent the use of tents, 6cc. I proposed to open it by caustic. But the gentleman principally concern 1 cerned preferred the lancet, by which about four ounces of pure florid blood was discharged; and the pericranium was entire and smooth. I then proposed a loose bandage, till the parts should have time gradually to contract. But I was again over-ruled, and a thick compress was tied close down, and a dossil put in the orifice. Next day the teguments adhered close to the pericranium, and a full sac was formed at each end. To discharge these, the gentleman tore up the scalp by thrusting a probe under it, and then renewed the compress. On the third day the sacs were again filled, and the parts adheadhered so firmly that the probe could not be introduced, though he tried it several ways, and with so much force that the bone was laid bare in two or three places; still, however, the compress was renewed. This treatment made the boy feverish, and occasioned an ?dema over the whole head. On the three succeeding days nothing was done, the gentleman being out of town, and the swellings increased very fast, with much pain and feverish sickness; and, on the fourth day, two caustics were applied in that inflamed state. This increased the fever and oedema, and even occasioned a little raving. raving. Next day, ...
