This case of hydrocephalus, we are told by the writer, had the usual symptoms; was neglected in the incipient stages; and when Mr. Fisher was called in, was much aggravated. The usual remedies were first tried by him, such as bleeding, blistering, and purging. Calomel and mercurial inunctions were next tried, to which the cure is attributed, without taking into account what assistance was derived from other remedies, or considering whether it was a case of hydrocephalus at all. We are much inclined to think it was not. So much for this man of war. A case of Staphyloma Scleroticae, detailed at some length and with great minuteness, by Dr. Maitlaud, informs us how often the eye may be tapped with impunity, being operated on, in this instance, no less than thirtythree times, from the 30th of May to the 15th of September. The operation invariably afforded relief, by evacuating the vitrous humour, which was morbidly increased in quantity and degenerated in kind. The rationale of the matter is, the lessening of distension. The principle once known, its application, when necessary, will follow. The writer thinks the same practice might be adopted with advantage in the early stages of staphyloma of the cornea. Dr. Borthwick presents himself to our notice, in a paper on the effects of Costiveness. Two cases are related, which redound to his credit; the first, a lady, suspected of having a consumptive affection, was treated by her medical attendants accordingly, and when their prescriptions failed, she was ordered out on a mission of health to Madeira, from which she derived some benefit. On returning home, however, the pseudo-phthisical complaint made its appearance a second time, when Dr. Borthwick was called in, and finding that she ...
