Not illustrated. 1861 Excerpt: ...and carelessness of what she did not feel. I shall never have a sense of rest, till you can tell me that she enters into your faith. I am chiefly reconciled to leaving her, because I trust that in her enfeebled, dependent state, she may become influenced by Miss Charlecote and by you. I cannot argue with her, said Phoebe. When she is well, she can always puzzle me; I lose her when she gets to her ego. You are the only one who can cope with that. The very reason for keeping away. Dont argue. Live and act. That was your lesson to me. Phoebe did not perceive, and Miss Fennimore loved her freedom from self-consciousness too well even for raticudes sake to molest her belief that the conversion was so%ely owing to Roberts powers of controversy. That one fleeting glimpse of inner life was the true farewell. The actual parting was a practical matter of hurry of trains, and separation of parcels, with Maria too busy with the Maltese dog to shed tears, or even to perceive that this was a final leave taking with one of those whom she best loved. CHAPTER XI. Tak down, tak down the mast of gowd, Set up the mast of tree, It sets not a forsaken lady To sail so gallantly.-Annie of Lochroyan. Qtumr little white-capped objects! The St. Wulstans irls marching to St. Pau.ls. Ah! the banner I helped to work! fiow well I remember the contriving that crozier upon it! How well it has worn! Sweet Honey must be in London; it was the sight she most grudged missing! So thought Lucilla Sandbroo as a cab conveyed her through the Whittingtonian intricacies. Her resi ence with Mrs. Willis Beaumont was not a passage in her life on which she loved to dwell. Neither partyhad been well content
