

Primitive Man

MAN must have lived during the time in which the last representatives of the ancient animal creation the mammoth, the great bear, the cave-hy?na, the Rhinoceros tichorinus, &c.were still in existence. It is this earliest period of mans history which we are now about to enter upon.We have no knowledge of a precise nature with regard to man at the period of his first appearance on the globe. How did he appear upon the earth, and in what spot can we mark out the earliest traces of him? Did he first come into being in that part of the world which we now call Europe, or is it the fact that he made his way to this quarter of our hemisphere, having first seen the light on the great plateaux of Central Asia?This latter opinion is the one generally accepted. In the work which will follow the present volume we shall see, when speaking of the various races of man, that the majority of naturalists admit nowadays one common centre of creation for all mankind. Man, no doubt, first came into being on the great plateaux of Central Asia, and thence was distributed over all the various habitable portions of our globe. The action of climate and the influences of the locality which he inhabited have, therefore, determined the formation of the different raceswhite, black, yellow, and redwhich now exist with all their infinite subdivisions.
