Not illustrated. 1878 Excerpt: ...proved amply in the Epistle to the Hebrews, be once realized, and the correlative action of the Church upon earth follows necessarily. Taken so, and with no exaltation of the human priest, this doctrine presents no real difficulty except upon the principles of the Solifidian, who would exclude the necessity of good works, and ought upon his own principles to exclude also the necessity of prayer, lest it should interfere with the integrity of the one effectual Intercession. The Holy Eucharist ought, therefore, to be taken with primary 1 I Cor. xi. 30. For this cause many are weak and sickly among you, and many sleep. See Narrative, p. 97. VOL. I. Q reference to the continued and continuous attitude of the High-Priest in heaven, whereby He pleads before the eternal throne His unrenowable Sacrifice, made once for all, and only with secondary relation to the scene enacted upon Mount Calvary. Jewish rites, being more rudimentary and earthly, represented by anticipation what was to be done by our Lord in this lower world. The great Christian Sacrament sets forth correlatively what is passing in the Courts above. A complete realization of this distinction would, I believe, remove much misconception upon this important subject. As before, so in the present case, these people appear to have derived much enlightenment from the Oxford school of theologians, who had already, in the movement commenced by the Tracts for the Times, taught upon the two great Sacraments the doctrines which have always obtained credence and authority in the Catholic Church. Their publications must have fallen into the hands of the leading men in the Body, who were also led on in a Catholic direction by their negotiations with the Churches abroad. First of all, therefore, in the c...
